“Essentially, I’m trying to depict how landscapes can be appreciated on an individual level and as part of a more comprehensive whole. I’m thinking of environments like people in the sense that they have agency - the ability to affect your worldview.

I use brushstrokes to describe the depth and complexity of nature - some flow together, while others counter each other. Each mark has its own character, but when you step back, their relationships form a cohesive system.

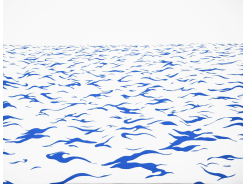

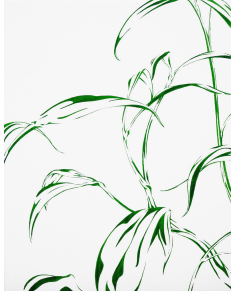

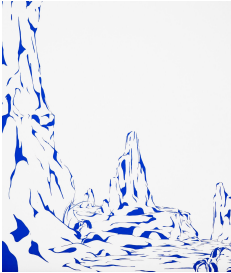

My process is heavily inspired by the concepts in Chinese landscape paintings, which have been practiced and refined for thousands of years. The artists’ marks suggest the temperament and define the subject, but withholding certain information allows viewers to bring the scene to life with their imagination. The same idea is present in ancient hieroglyphics, sculptures, and monumental architecture. Ideally, I want each person to have a personalized experience with the painting and feel free to share their perspective/ interpretation.

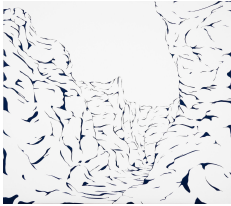

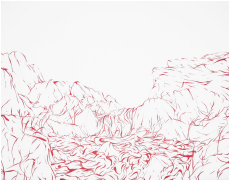

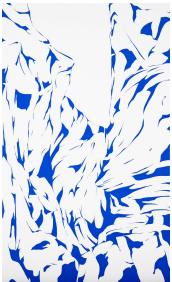

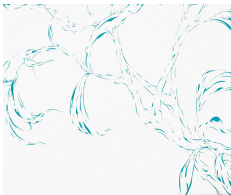

I see the paintings as part of a larger interconnected world. I want people to imagine a reality that links all these images, and to think of more content at every level of that world. In a sense, it's about world-building and discovering the potential for similarly impactful moments both within and outside each painting.”
